The Physics of Spirit

Four Energetic Propositions that Enliven the Human Condition

By J. Frederick Arment

A Treatise on the Theoretical Derivatives of a Universal Waveform Theory

THE WAVEFORM THEORY

The waveform theory advances the idea, based upon current scientific models, that humans are simply composite energy forms. We are vibrations of energy that move in waves to create our material body, which interacts with the flow of energy in our environment.

As with all energy in the universe, the waves of our bodies move within the laws of physics. We emit and receive waves. We interact and connect with outside waveforms. When the interactions are destructive, energy dissipates. When the interactions are constructive, energy increases.

Physical interactions -- such as eating, drinking and breathing -- sustain our bodies. Mental interactions -- such as observing, responding and planning -- are energy transfers that endeavor to increase our wellbeing. Spiritual interactions -- such as meditation, rituals and worship -- are energy transfers that connect us with the harmonies we associate with love.

These energy transfers, whether physical, mental or spiritual, often flow with the use of waveguides. A waveguide is something that constrains or guides the propagation of electromagnetic waves. It routes them along a path defined by the physical construction of the waveguide. Engineered examples are wires, antennas, and musical instruments.

Since spiritual interactions that send and receive the energy of love also moves in waves, we construct waveguides to channel or guide that energy. Waveguides of the spirit are constructions of consciousness like thought patterns that guide the energy of mental activity to become actions and ideas. Spiritual waveguides include our methods of prayer, our religions, and the interpersonal relationships that increase our feelings of love.

The name we have given to the part of us that channels spiritual energy is the soul. The soul is a part of our genetic consciousness. It is a physical construct of waves just as a thought increases in substance prior to taking action. The soul can be visualized as a waveguide, or in religious texts a vessel, within our bodies that allows us to emit, receive, and focus love. The soul is individual in nature, yet just as we create farms for growing food, we create religions and philosophies as societal waveguides for growing spiritual energy.

The name we give to our belief, or understanding, of these societal waveguides is faith. Tolerance of alternative faiths comes from an understanding that these waveguides of belief are of the same nature and are intended only to help the individual connect and draw benefits from the same source of universal love.

As individuals we experience constructive interchanges, or resonating frequencies, with other wave sources. Harmonic vibrations, according to wave science, can focus, amplify, and store energy. In the case of spiritual energy, our souls, like substantive ideas, help us maintain continuity with loving relationships. We focus, amplify, and store the energy of love.

Finding our personal resonating waveguides, whether it is in nature, or a religion, or a special person in our lives, achieves a high intensity of creative energy, which is called inspiration. With inspiration we can spontaneously direct our energy toward the creative love that gives us purpose. Fulfilling our purpose is simply resonating with actions of universal love.

A theological understanding of the physics of love provides a way to fully realize all in the universe is of the same nature. It allows us to eclipse our dualistic divisions and live not as a part but fully as the whole. With the physics of love we experience the resonant harmony and peace that we all journey toward.

FOUR ENERGETIC PROPOSITIONS THAT ENLIVEN THE HUMAN CONDITION

(Expanded explanations follow in the next section)

1. Spirit is energy and it flows by the laws of physics.

Our fundamental nature, whether from a divine or corporeal source, is electromagnetic waves that carry energy resonating within what science describes as a continuum, either of spacetime or filamentary space.

2. Spirituality is the creative interplay of electromagnetic waves.

Radiant energy is expressed as spiritual when electromagnetic waves interact spontaneously, beyond cause and effect, to create new resonating energy forms within the omnipresent field.

3. Spiritual waveguides give purpose through reciprocal love.

People create waveguides to focus spiritual energy in synchrony with other waveforms to achieve the harmonic resonance that amplifies and stores the energy of love.

4. The dual nature of radiant energy offers a spiritual choice for how we live.

The spiritual field is the energetic source from which all things are created, through which all things love, and to which all things return as radiance in the omnipresent field.

Note: Radiant energy is the energy of electromagnetic and gravitational radiation.

Radiant energy can be defined as the waves themselves or the energy the waves carry in their oscillating electric and magnetic fields. Energy can neither be created or destroyed but it can be transformed into new waves with different properties. Waves have energy and momentum and interact with other waves through either cause-and-effect or spontaneous processes. Spontaneity is the non-causal process that happens within the wave itself as expressed in a spontaneous, creative interaction. Spontaneous processes cause a decrease in a system's free energy and do not need to be driven by an outside source of energy.

EXPANDED EXPLANATION

1. Spirit is energy and it flows by the laws of physics.

Our fundamental nature, whether from a divine or corporeal source, is electromagnetic waves that carry energy resonating within what science describes as a continuum, either of spacetime or filamentary space.

The material and nonmaterial universe is comprised of oscillating electromagnetic waves that carry energy. The material world is energy trapped in a particle waveform that can be measured by space and time. The nonmaterial world is a pervasive field of radiant energy that we experience as the spectrum of electromagnetic waves, of which a small portion includes visible light. The finite universe, in present scientific theory, emerged spontaneously from infinite field potential or, perhaps, from a singularity or microcosm of matter.

All waves within the radiant spectrum as well as those expressed as matter are interconnected aspects of an omnipresent field. The energetic nature of the universe does not preclude an “a priori” source, or God, but rather offers an attainable and understandable spiritual quality within the electromagnetic spectrum as a means of human attainment. As such, the existence and function of spiritual energy can be more clearly understood as we learn more about the laws of physics.

2. Spirituality is the creative interplay of electromagnetic waves.

Radiant energy is experienced as spiritual when electromagnetic waves interact spontaneously, beyond cause and effect, to create new resonating energy forms within the omnipresent field.

When we look at the underlying way the universe operates, we see that the waves we emit and absorb necessarily form our personal waveform or energy field. The mechanism of the physical, material universe (i.e. the electromagnetic waveforms that comprise our measurable world) is cause and effect. For every cause, there is a reaction. Non-measurable electromagnetic waves (i.e. the spectrum of radiation, which includes visible light) are also subject to cause and effect. Yet beyond cause and effect, there are subtle interactions that are spontaneous in nature (in and of a person or system without outside cause).

These spontaneous interactions continuously and creatively transform the universe as well as our individual lives. The spontaneous mechanism of electromagnetic interactions differentiates spiritual electromagnetic energy from other expressions of radiant energy under the influence of cause and effect. Within the realm of spontaneity, waves can be generated that are constructive (consonant) as well as destructive (dissonant). What we experience as spiritual energy is within the spectrum of constructive spontaneity.

3. Spiritual waveguides give purpose through reciprocal love.

People create waveguides to focus radiant energy in synchrony with other waveforms to achieve the harmonic resonance that amplifies and stores the energy of love.

A waveguide is a structure that guides waves. Examples are cables and antennas as well as the body of a musical instrument. By restricting the normal expansion of a wave's energy, the guide enables a signal or object to move with minimal loss of energy. In the case of antennas, for instance, through the reciprocating process of emitting and receiving signals, the waveguide's effect can achieve directional gain, increased amplitude, or store additive strength.

Spiritual energy, or creative energy as the spectrum of spontaneity (as differentiated from destructive spontaneous energy), can also be directed by the use of a waveguide. The act of directing our spiritual energy toward another waveform (i.e. person, animal, even a house or nature itself) is the act of loving. Humans have given a name to this conscious waveguide for constructive spiritual energy: the soul. Just as an idea inside our minds gives structure to our thoughts (which, indeed, can be constructive or destructive), the soul is a construct of consciousness that can be fine tuned and utilized for the purpose of giving and receiving love.

When love is returned as a reciprocating wave by that to which you give love, the frequency of the two energetic waves can be in what science calls phase, which can achieve the benefits of harmonic resonance. When two souls are, in effect, synchronized, the wavelengths of energy become consonant, or combined, to achieve twice the amplitude and of greater intensity than is possible alone. Through our spiritual waveguides, we can focus, amplify, and store love. Achieving a state of reciprocating love with other waveforms is the path of least resistance and gives us our sense of peace and creative purpose.

4. The dual nature of radiant energy offers a spiritual choice for how we live.

The field of spontaneous constructive energy is the source from which all things are created, by which all things love, and to which all things return as radiance in the omnipresent field.

Creation can be as vast as the birth of the universe or as humble as a child's painting. Both have commonality in the spontaneous nature of the act of creating. The energy of creation is carried by electromagnetic waves that combine in constructive ways from a source in and of itself, whether a child, or nature, or a divinity. Everything in the universe is the constructive result of a spontaneous creative action.

Love is an energetic act of creativity that, by the nature of energy, is comprised of electromagnetic waves. The energy used for actions of love comes from the radiant spectrum and is differentiated only by the mechanism, which is spontaneity.

Consciousness evolution created souls to provide individuals a means for efficiently focusing radiant energy toward the object of love.

The law of the conservation of energy tells us that no energy can be created or destroyed within the system of the universe. When a person loses the energy that makes his/her living material waveform, that energy necessarily survives. Eventually, the vestiges of that material form dematerializes and returns to the radiant energy from which all things are created. As acts of creation, the transformative energy of the loving by individual souls continues to exist as the consonant effects of a changed universe, perhaps within the definition of a collective soul.

CONCLUSION

To embrace the idea that all things are made of waves is to see the world in a less material way. To dematerialize the spiritual world as the interplay of radiant energy from its current mode of fixed religions or a God in our image is to be conscious of the underlying currents that release us from cause and effect toward the choice of spontaneous, creative love. By dematerializing the soul and to see it as our personal waveguide of love, we can fully utilize the laws of harmonic resonance within the physics of spirit. By dematerializing our belief systems as waveguides of faith, we can energize the spiritual life that is the essence of universal love.

When the spiritual aspect of life is dematerialized, we can better understand and utilize spiritual energy. We are then free to establish our spiritual waveguides as personal meditative practices of love.

The more we comprehend and understand that spirit flows by the laws of physics, the more we can benefit from the choice the interplay of electromagnetic waves provides. The dual nature of radiant energy between cause and effect and spontaneity offers a profound opportunity, or choice. The present waveform of our lives is a composite energy field of our individual creation and love is the life force that transforms our lives.
